Training Expense per Employee

Definition & Measurement Details

What is Training Expense per Employee?

The total training and development expense incurred by the company divided by the number of employees within the company receiving training (i.e., “learners”) over the same time period. Training and development expenses typically include salaries for dedicated training employees and any external vendor expenses (e.g., training courses, training technology/products, etc.).

Why should this KPI be measured?

Training Expense per Employee measures the average cost of training a single employee over a certain time period (typically measured annually). While training costs should be controlled and kept at reasonable levels,

How is this KPI calculated?

Two values are used to calculate this KPI: (1) total training and development costs incurred by the company, and (2) the number of employees receiving training over the same time period.
